About this Seminar:-
Modern construction projects frequently involve a high degree of complexity, with multiple parties carrying out differing roles under a range of different contracts.

Traditionally, arbitration has served the construction industry effectively in the case of disputes involving only two parties, such as between contractor and sub-contractor. However, when disputes arise on complex projects, all too often parties are not amenable to resolving their disputes in the same forum because some parties have agreed contractually to arbitrate with different parties in separate arbitrations, while other have no obligation to arbitrate at all. The result is the risk of “double jeopardy” – that is, decisions on essentially the same facts, but in different forums and with different results.

In this seminar, Mr Bruner will discuss ways in which the risk of double jeopardy on major multi-party construction projects can be mitigated, and will address issues surrounding joinder, consolidation and the use of appellate arbitration.
